Got a great idea for a webseries? We want to hear it!

We want stories that cross platforms, cross borders, cross boundaries but hit home. Write what you know. Write what you want to see. Write something new.

We're putting together a slate of online dramas to pitch to broadcasters, brands and social media networks, and we're opening up the field to students and young storytellers. If you've got a great idea for an online series that could play on Myspace, Bebo or Facebook, PITCH IT TO US!

In the digital landscape, the only currency that really matters is attention: keep it low budget but high in style. Episodic stories told in 3-5 minute video chunks that could be produced by young film-makers such as yourself. Think practical but also think social. We want stories that people will talk about, blog about, twitter about, argue about, and most importantly care about.

Pitch us the next KateModern or The Wire for the web or Zombieland: the Video Diary!

The best entries could be further developed under the auspices of Met Film's BAFTA-winning Russell Stopford and big-hitting online producer Serena Cullen—executive producer of the first show to cross from digital to TV, Bebo series *Sofia's Diary, which aired on Fiver in the UK. Currently working in both feature films and online development, Serena has produced numerous shows for TV and online, including BBC3's groundbreaking Grease Monkeys.

If your pitch is taken forward and commissioned, you'll get a story credit and a paid producing, directing or writing role in the production.

Remember: we want episodic narratives that work in the busy busy busy environment of the internet. Focus in on the story you want to tell, and the characters you want to explore. Apart from that, there are no limits. Any genre, any style, any perspective—just keep it original!
